To Kashmir, the Homeland that was

I am grateful to Rauf for his insightful inputs while driving me to different places. With young people like him, there still is hope for Kashmir.

For a man who no longer has a homeland, writing becomes a place to live.

(Theodor Adorno)

Introduction

I was invited to Srinagar to receive the 'Lifetime Award for the Best Book in English' for my anthology, Enchanting World of Infants. I would be going there after eighteen years. That is a long time, nearly a generation. It was a hard decision on many counts.

First, going back just for a brief visit, after having been violently thrown out, is a painful proposition; when all you expect to witness is the decay and death of the values you cherished and the eclipse of the plurality and syncretism that Kashmir boasted of to the rest of the world. However, I would go with an open mind.

Second, I had declined previous invitations to visit Kashmir as a participant in inter-faith dialogues, because of the threat perception to my life for having endeavored to expose the true face of terrorism that went under the charade of Azadi, and for championing the rights of Kashmiri Pandits to return to Kashmir. Over the years, even as terrorism has beaten a retreat for some time and threats to life receded, there has been a further consolidation of aggressive Islam in Kashmir, and of a relentless trend to cultural and religious exclusivity by the systematic suppression and extirpation of other religious communities. How would I face the changed milieu?

Third, my mother with many disabilities was bedridden after a recent hip fracture. She called for a round-the-clock attention. My absence, even for a short time, would put Leela, my wife, to great strain.

Fourth, the award ceremony on 4 October was under a thick cloud. In the aftermath of the fierce controversy over Shri Amarnath Yatra (the Hindu pilgrimage to the holy cave), which had tragically polarized society across a religious and regional divide and caused hysteria of protests and processions, strikes and shut-downs, mayhem and violence lasting several months, the Muslim separatists had given a "Lal Chowk Chalho" call for Monday, 6 October. Several thousand people were expected to participate in the long march to the historic Lal Chowk in Srinagar. This was purported to be a demonstration of mass support for Azadi and an act of defiance against the State administration and the Republic of India. Anything was possible under the circumstances - pre-emptive arrests, cancellation of all important events, curfew, violence, etc.

Yet, the heart longed for Kashmir, for just one glimpse of her. The restless soul not only sought solace in her lap but also yearned to comfort her for the hurt and humiliation heaped on her. Here was the opportunity I would fain grab with both my hands, for time was ticking away and who knew what the future had to offer?

I had vowed that if I ever returned to Srinagar, my first port of call would be the Siva temple on top the Shankaracharya hill. Since 1983, when I moved into my own house in Inidra Nagar, I would climb the hill to the temple almost every morning till the day we were forced out of Kashmir. It had always been an invigorating and soul-stirring experience that I sorely missed in exile. There was also a burning desire to visit Rajveri Kadal, where I was born, and to walk the lanes where I had spent my childhood.

Now was the call!

Rauf, the son of my deceased friend, would take me around during my 2-day stay. How much ground would we be able to cover under the circumstances was beyond any guesswork. But, we would give it our best shot. It was going to be a bird's eye view, after all.

Here, in verse, is how it happened.

The Debate

There is a debate in the family whether I should travel to Srinagar to receive the award in person or ask them to send it to me after the scheduled function.

Kashmir has never left my thoughts ever since I left her, 18 years back.
Every night when I go to bed, every morning when I wake up, every time I dream a dream, and every day when I cogitate, I roam the lanes and by lanes of the home where I was born, the school where I learnt my three Rs, and the hospital where I worked and taught.
That was my small beautiful world that I would loathe exchange even for paradise.

I often recall my friends in Kashmir and remember them beyond their religious identities, and before the time there was anything like 'them' and 'us'.

The pantheon of gods around Hariparbat that I frequented as a boy, the lakes Dal and Manasbal where I often rowed with my spouse, and the hills and mountains that I climbed with my children, have defined my memories in exile.
I would die to be there again for once,
if only once.

But there are fears and doubts.
Eighteen years is a long time, a new generation has taken birth and a generation passed away, and much has changed since we were forced from Kashmir – the paradigms and perceptions, the human relationships, the tactic and rhetoric, the political affiliations, the sub-continental equations.

More importantly, would I be safe from the militants even if the threat perceptions are now said to be remote?
Was I not on top of their hit list for voicing my thoughts against their heinous crimes?

Leela is supportive but concerned:
"You never trust a desperado out to prove a point; you could be their best bet, an easy target."

And my siblings and children settled in many continents are even more apprehensive, for distance magnifies threat perceptions, and lends an exceptional poignancy to feelings of concern for your kin.

Even as I am convinced that I am remote from their calculations, as remote as a thought in the mind of the dead, yet, a doubt lingers in my mind: If some militant got it into his head to shoot me down how will I face my mother and spouse, how will I answer my children?
Am I being selfish?
Am I too covetous for the award?

And finally, but not the least, my mother's state of health is a concern; would my wife be able to cope alone with a bed-ridden ninety-year old, on the edge of oblivion?

I wished the ceremony were deferred and held in Jammu rather than Srinagar, since the dissidents are hell bent on the proposed march to Lal Chowk on Monday, the 6th of October.

Am I flying into the eye of a storm?
Am I flying into danger?

To receive an award in person is an honorable proposition; stronger is the urge for a reunion with people and places where I spent all my childhood and prime, and my middle years till I was forty-nine; where my forefathers lived and died, where my soul doth reside.

Besides, what a season to visit the valley, to see her again in autumnal glory – the splendour of the flaming Chinars, the sparkling springs and placid lakes, the roses, marigolds and chrysanthemums, the blue skies and golden sunsets.

No, there is nothing to stop me, for it does seem that the award is just an excuse thrown my way by providence to fulfill my intense longing for a rendezvous with the valley.

Day One

Friday, 3 October 2008

On Board Jet Airways, Jammu- Srinagar

How come I feel so composed and calm when my heart should be in a flutter to hug my homeland in half an hour?

Having waited 18 years, 5 months and 3 days where is the thrill of a lover when the hour of reunion is finally here?

I have pined long years of separation; why are my emotions so dumb and deprived when the time has finally arrived?

I look out from the window - the snowy ranges are out of sight and ominous clouds of dissent and anger hover over the valley of Kashmir.
There is a strange mismatch between the tranquility in my mind and the turbulence in the air.

I look inside the plane - few passengers, fewer visitors, when they should have been swarming in this season of song and dance, of mellowing fruit and harvest, of Kashmir at her fiery best.

As the time arrives, I look out again for an aerial peek at Mother Kashmir before I land and tightly hug her.

Soon, we loose height, to find in view rows of hutments I had never seen, in various shades of grey and green.
They are the barracks, I am told, for the soldiers defending the airport.

Out of the plane, it is 33 Celsius.
It is dull, it is hot, it is sultry and the haze in the atmosphere hides the mountains in the periphery.

The airport has gone international and the tarmac could be anywhere - Delhi, Dublin or Delaware - not the Srinagar airport that had always been so friendly and familiar.

But, for now, I feel like a stranger, a mere nobody.

There is not one familiar face in the crowd of passengers, nor in the officials, who look at me in passing with a bored yawn from behind the counters.

Pray, who am I?
What brings me here?

There is still no feeling inside me of that moment of eternity when one touches the feet of Mother after a long absence from her.
Am I moving in a dream?
Or, is it not my homeland but a different place altogether?

Welcome

Suddenly I am somebody when a Sikh driver and a Muslim official of the J&K State Academy of Arts, Culture and Languages, waiting at the gate to receive me, ask if I am Dr. Chowdhury.

My baggage is hustled into a van as they receive another awardee who has traveled in the same plane, and yet another, unknown to me?

"Welcome to Paradise" reads a signboard on a street pole as we drive outside the airport.
A picture of Habba Khatoon, with a popular couplet from her, hangs from another pole; and from yet another a rather outlandish one of Lalla Ded, that brings to mind her haunting vaakh:
"My precept gave me a lone mantra, asking me to withdraw from outside and to delve deep within.
That became my goal and gospel and I started dancing nude, without the worldly trappings."

Yes, if we desire salvation from the tragedy that besets our land we need Lalla's divine vision to tread the path of self-introspection and cast off the baggage of ignorance.

I see a short stretch of a new driveway with young Chinars in the divider, and a new generation of poplars on the sides, as old as my absence from here.

As we go down the airport plateau there is no evidence of fall yet, but dull grey and green leaves in decay, while new constructions come into view where paddy fields once held sway – private residences built in style, shopping malls flowing over the pavements, new mosques in green with crescents, their minaret's spiking the sky, and school buildings rising many floors high.
What a mix of education and religion!

O, where are the fiery Chinars of October, where the bracing breeze, and where the sweet nip in the air?
Am I too early in the month here?

The streets are rather sparse with people-some in skullcaps, long shirts and shalwars, others bearded, chatting on the shops.
Because it is Friday afternoon, the driver explains, people are resting after the prayer.
It also happens to be the third Eid (the hangover lasts a full week here); and the call by the Hurriyat (that conglomerate of many-hued separatists), for Monday march to Lal Chowk has cast a pall of fear in the air.

First Glimpse of the Lord

Gone are the farmlands and fields, gone the pastures and rural scenes.
Shops with big billboards line the streets on either side, while fences, strong and high, insulate the private lots from the evil eye.

Our first halt is at Lal Mandi, the office of the Academy, where the driver stops to report the arrival of the awardees.

I come out of the van, and,
what an arresting sight!
Mountain ranges in the background and beloved Shankaracharya right in front, towering tall over this ancient city in its breathtaking profundity!
The heart gives a loud thud for that joyous climb up the hill - my everyday rendezvous before our forced exodus.

My salutations to you, Siva; you are my first port of call and I am here to fulfill my vow that if I ever returned to the valley, to you would I make my first bow.

Vitasta

I look on my left at the Vitasta that has meandered merrily from the dawn of history, and, on her sacred shores, reared generations of its progeny.

Alas, what offers the sight is a lazy, almost stagnant stream, duckweed and refuse, and an occasional animal carcass, floating on her sullied surface.

There is no evidence, whatever, of her youthful voluptuous sway but bare banks sloping up to the bund, and the river in deep depression, bemoaning the valley's transformation.

We cross a new bridge across the river, unspectacular and architecturally poor, that supplants the zero bridge just near,
and blights the beauty of the bund here.
We turn right soon after and move into a high security zone - the Government Guest House, the Stadium, and the Amarsingh Club - fortified by a wire-mesh fence, and gun-wielding personnel on guard.

Cricket

Here in this dilapidated stadium, young boys in white shirts and trousers, absorbed in the game of willow, strike a familiar secular scene, quite different from the much feared picture of youth brandishing grenades and guns that one hears about Kashmir.

But was cricket just a sporting game ever in our religiously charged atmosphere?
Were we not always at the receiving end of the fire and fury of partisan mobs during India- Pakistan matches here?
Were we not stoned and sworn at if India happened to win a match, and taunted, teased and pushed for the ignominy of her defeat?
Were we not forced to join their revelry when India lost, and in their mourning in her victory?
Did we have the right to betray or express our opinions and sentiments freely?

Was it not in this cricket stadium, somewhere in the nineteen eighties, when, to the utter disbelief of the Caribbean's, the spectators gave them a standing ovation, cheering every run they scored, while hooting the Indian players down, and rejoicing at the fall of their wickets, in the first and only cricket international ever played in Srinagar?

That day, the crowds ran amuck, renting the skies with their slogans, waving green flags with crescents, pelting stones at the Indian fielders, writing an epitaph for cricket here.
Verily, the boys fancied the Kalashnikov over the famously indigenous willow.

Are we witnessing a change of heart now?
Are the boys fed up with the gun and wanting to return to some fun?

Chinars

If they have escaped the axe of the militant and the greedy politician, it is only here in this high security zone on the right bank of the river.
Elsewhere, the Chinars are getting extinct like the indigenous Kashmiri Pandit.

Yes, the Chinars here stand lofty as ever, a profound feature of the valley's grandeur, as ancient and sacred as one can remember, a recurring subject of poetic metaphor, the sentinels of the ethos of Kashmir.

But, to my utter dismay, not a leaf has changed color till date, the colors I had come to see - golden, fiery red and rusty - that would leap to the sky like flames, and help dispel the dull, dreary and dismal mood that hangs heavy on the valley.

I miss the evocative autumnal scenes of mounds of fallen leaves, that would dot every street and lane in village, town and city.
I miss the familiar smell of spirals of smoke that went up lazily when the mounds smoldered slowly and turned to soft charcoal for use in the kangri - that inimitable, invariable companion which warms the heart and bosom of every Kashmiri.

Inside the Circuit House

Here is where state guests are lodged and I remember having once been here to have a look at a Central Minister who fell sick while on a holiday but lost his even sicker temper because it took me time to reach here.

I am conducted to a room, a rather bleakish place, cluttered with furniture, but the walls bare,
the door lock dysfunctional, the bed sheets discolored from disuse, the faucets leaking in the bathroom and a miniscule bar of soap that keeps slipping through the fingers.

In the dinning room (for a cup of tea), poorly lighted and rather dingy, there is a breath of recognition in the two waiters who greet me smilingly.

They cannot be more than twenty and I would not know them nor would they know me, yet there strikes a note of familiarity beyond the pale of understanding, like acquaintances from faraway times, like old friends or relations, like a father meeting his separated sons.

They are like the young Chinars that I saw along the driveway from the airport, a new generation, to me unknown, strangers, yet so much like my own.

I never experienced that déjà vu in my eighteen years of wanderings away from my home in the valley.
Pray, what is the common chord that strikes between them and me?
Why this feeling out of the ordinary?

Is this what defined Kashmiriyat, that sprang from a unique harmony between the Pandits and the Muslims - a fellow feeling that had survived down many a century, till it took a beating from the gun and changed the human equation?

Yet, all may not be lost, for it seems to me that the feeling still survives somewhere deep in the Kashmiri psyche.
Otherwise how does one explain this warm feeling in my heart?
Or is it just an illusion, a wishful thinking, a make-believe situation?

Is it that I am welcome here only as long as I am a guest and not when I wish to return to my homeland for good?

There is an adage in Kashmiri: Strong are the bonds of blood that, like chains of gold, do not easily break.
How I wish it were true for every human relationship beyond religious and political divide, beyond time, place and age.

A Welcome Hug

Rauf is the son of my deceased friend, my one surviving link with the valley since I was forced to flee.
He arrives soon after and hugs me tightly, a long and welcome hug (we had met only a month earlier when he was in Jammu on official duty).
Part of the hug is certainly his own but a larger share is from the valley (he did not have to tell me).

"I am here to drive you around," Rauf tells me,
"that you may convince yourself that militancy has run its course and it is time for you to return."

"But," I ask him, as I get on his car,
"the strikes and hartals go on, the protests marches never cease, the bombs blast, the guns fire, and there is violence in the air?"

"Yes, a few incidents here and there have become a part of our culture; but, it will pass, I am sure, for the common man is fed up with the cries for Jihad and Azadi, and craves for peace and harmony," rues he.

"People have seen through the militants, and the leaders who stoke their passions.
Be it the subversives and separatists, be it the politicians and the ideologues, they all have their axe to grind; they give a damn for the common man who is dragged into this for no fault of his."

Shankaracharya

We start with the first call of duty and drive up the Mt. Shankaracharya, to the temple,
after passing through the security at the foothill.

Lame foot on the accelerator (he contracted polio in infancy but fought the handicap bravely not unlike his noble father, who battled crippling spondylitis till his unfortunate demise at fifty), he drives almost recklessly, negotiating the curves fast, and faster, as we climb the steep road, offering a kaleidoscopic view of lake Dal through the thick jungle.

He speaks with passion, without a pause, mourning the slow death of the lake, through encroachments by predators - humans who claim it from the periphery, and killer weeds that grab it from within.

He is on a high, almost intoxicated with joy for showing me around, in his own car (his father died a pauper and left nothing behind except a fair name and good will).

"Do you watch TV?"
he asks me suddenly,
Not really, I reply, except for a few channels – BBC, Animal Planet and Discovery.
"What about Peace Channel?"
It is quite enlightening, Dr. Zakir's discussions, especially," says he.
"I heard that name somewhere," I reply.
"A great exponent of religions, he traces them all to Abraham, whom the Jews acknowledge and the Muslims, and the Christians too.
Jews and Muslims and Christians are children of Abraham, he says, and, so are the Hindus, he believes."
"Yes, we are children of the same God," I reply.
"The word Brahma is a Hindu derivation from Abraham.
Don't you agree?" asks he.

I just smile for I wonder if he would accept that Brahma is a great concept, that Brahma has been there much before any of the religions he named, that Brahma and Creation go together Yet, was it not gratifying - a Muslim youngster wanting to strike a common thread between religions?

After a dizzying drive a thousand feet up from the base we come to a halt at the top of the hill, and I ask Rauf to stay behind sparing him the long flight of stairs to the temple.

Even as I read on a notice board, 'No cameras allowed beyond this point,' from a strange impulse, I ask the sentry on duty to let me carry the camera with me.
But, my argument fails to convince for he has orders to carry out, he tells me almost apologetically.

Not the least dismayed, I almost run up the stone stairs, hundred odd steps to the end, and on to the plateau now almost shrunk to a small courtyard, what with structures that have come up, obliterating the view of the world that we would enjoy in days of yore.

Army shacks, tents and a lavatory blight this hallowed patch of hill, and a wire-mesh fence all round has closed the trekking routes, that I would often traverse - from the north and from the south, from the east and from the west.

The only redeeming feature is a small Chinar of my times now grown to a strapping youth, adorning this small plateau here.

Just as I start to climb the short flight of steep steps to the sanctum sanctorum I hear a voice from behind
"Namaskar, Doctor Sahib," and I turn around to find a smiling face that I cannot place.

"I have been your patient, sir, Maharaj Kishen is my name.
What a delight to see you here;
and if I may dare, it will be a great honor to serve you a cup of tea after your audience with the deity."

Oh that is so gracious of him, but, rather than a cup of tea, could he arrange to get my camera through the security, I ask him unabashedly?

Who is he, I wonder?
What is he doing here?
Why did I ask him a favour?
Did I put him in some discomfiture?
But, before I could stop him and find an answer he dashed away in a hurry with a gesture that implied he would not leave it untried.

The Audience

Oh how I have cherished this moment, imagined it again and again, and dreamt it every night, to be face to face with you,
if only once,
my Siva,
my lord!

For, neither your beautiful visage nor my faith in you dimmed even a bit in the course of time; the flame of my devotion unwavering in the storms of exile.

Oh, how those large red-chocolate ovals, standing out to shine ever bright against the greenish-grey background of this sanctified granite rock, kept my faith alive these lonesome years!

Oh, how I always marveled at the Master Artist who mixed those colors and chiseled that shape!
For, never was a stone as sacred to me, never a lingam inspired such divinity, never an image, icon or deity raised such visions of eternity.

Now, when I find you again, in flesh and blood, and the eternal spirit of divinity that has enthused millions like me, my hands tremble as they move to feel you – your electrifying cool balmy touch that has been denied me in the hot arid plains for eighteen long summers.

Come, let us hug each other in a mighty long and lingering embrace to fill the void of lost years, so I take a good measure of you as you take of me.

Come, there is so much to share, so much to speak to each other, to unfreeze congealed memories, to recompense the pangs of separation, and to drink deep of your ambience, so I take the impressions back with me to last me till we meet again.

Come, let's make the best of what we have for time is short, as it always is when lovers meet.

Is it just a coincidence that I see no one else here, but only you and me?
Or is it again your benevolence that you arranged a special rendezvous on purpose?

I have come empty handed, no pine cones to offer that I used to pick on the way, no flowers, no herbs, no blandishments.
I will not waste my time giving you a bath with milk, massaging you with honey and ghee, lighting a lamp and burning incense.
I have come to offer myself, my entirety,
my essence.

An Overview

What a view from here, that stretches beyond infinity, a soulful view that mattered so much to me and my family.

If there is anything that has not changed it is the mountains in the distance, and the high pilgrimages nearby, that beckoned me in days of yore – the Hershewar, Sarshewar and Mahadev that I scaled in my lonely climbs up these lofty ranges.

Nor has the sky changed here, the beautiful azure blue, nor the languorous clouds of myriad shapes that linger amorously on the mountains peaks with a deep love-sickness that I have imbibed and permeates my heart like a sweet ache.

All else has transformed – the lake Dal, once the city's shining jewel, sorrowfully shrunk to a sad pool; the tiny island, we called Nehru Park, now a part of the larger land mass that has been claimed from the lake; houses and hotels dotting the landscape where floating gardens, water lilies and swans once held sway; the Vitasta that meandered down the city dancing like a beautiful belle, now hidden in the jungle of concrete; and Srinagar, as viewed from here, a jumble of tinned rooftops and balconies crowding each other out - a stark evidence of the insatiable hunger for land, water and space, transforming into a tinsel town this paradise of rivers, springs and lakes.

Encore

It was with a mixed emotion I took leave of you, my lord, and walked backwards till you were out of view, and then, turning round, climbed down the steps fast to where Rauf waited for me below.

But you must have laughed when I said "Till we meet again," for, when I bowed before my exit, I saw a smile on your face, a signature smile that you give when you are at your benevolent best.

Lo, on the last but one rung, I find Mahraj Krishen again, (my camera in his pocket), signing me to retrace my steps all the way up, for an encore.

He makes light of my apology for having pushed him to do a wrong thing.
How can it be wrong for a devotee to want to capture the images of the lord, he asks me.

So here I am again, to ask your pardon for this innocent transgression that only you make happen.

I take shots from all your sides, yet, what sides am I talking of, the perfect oval that you are?
Can anyone really capture your formless form in a painting, picture or sculpture?

A cup of Tea

After I have taken pictures of the lake, the sky, the city, appears Mahraj Krishen again with a steaming cup of tea.

The temple priest joins soon after pleading with me to give him a quick look for he has been ailing for long from some mysterious illness that gives him fever and weakness.

He calls it divine intervention that Siva called me on purpose here, for it was only a day earlier that he had been counseled to take the bus to Jammu in order to consult me there!

Isn't that providential, my lord; isn't that quite like you?
Or, are we humans too credulous to make so much of mere coincidences?

But even statistics fail to explain so many happenstances together, for, not only do you earn me the award and contrive my long-cherished visit to you, not only do you arrange the ceremony here against all the odds in this vicious atmosphere, not only do you arrange me the camera that is not allowed to anybody, but, you also get the physician to an ailing patient right to his door, sparing him an arduous journey.

As I think about it, and endeavor to tread delicately the thin line between science and spirituality, I know, you must be laughing again at my childlike impetuosity.

Dal Lake

Down the driveway and along the boulevard we are on the shoreline of lake Dal.

But, what meets the eye is a dismal picture.

There is not a visitor in evidence, when tourists should have been flocking here; not a boat sailing on the water, when the gentle cadence of the oars pulling the spring shikaras should have been music to the ears.

O where is Abdullah, who would row me for hours on the placid waters in his 'Prince of Lake', and gift me the best of nadru harvested from the lake's bosom?
That crunchy feel of the lotus root, the invariable dish in our home, still lingers in my mouth after nearly two decades.

The lake Dal is shrunken and sad, her waters turbid green, duckweed floating on the surface, red algae that nourish on human excreta choking it from within.
She is dying, this fair maiden - a sign of the ominous times we live in!

Ever since I remember, the State Government has been floating sham projects and schemes under the pretext of retrieving the lake from the jaws of the greedy grabbers and the claws of the killer weed.
Alas, the billions that have been pouring in from the Central Government in New Delhi, and the international funding agencies, have been sucked into the black hole that the lake Dal has become.

The mandarins and ministers, the politicians and project managers, the high officials and the lowly workers - one and all - have joined in the big loot, while the hapless lake Dal dies a slow but certain death.

Zeishta

Along the erstwhile Palace Road, that also leads to the Governor's house, through a maze of security barricades, we drive on a low hill to a short flight of stairs to the Zeishta temple.

I do not find the small waterfall that welcomed you here at the entry.
Has it dried up or been diverted to water some greedy minister's farmhouse?

What a pity that odd structures – shops and hutments – have come up even in this hallowed place, blotting Patee Mahal out the view, eating up the vast open space where mendicants found solitude during the day and fairies danced at night ?

This used to be my favorite Sunday haunt, as also the climb up this mountain through the densest jungle I ever trekked, rife with black bear and bramble that I brushed with so often.

Even Zeistha, the presiding deity - mounted in the middle of the spring, resplendent in garish robes, fenced around with iron grills, crisscrossed with blinking light bulbs of so many colours that create an eerie ambience - looks out of place, all askance.

Her once sparkling water has turned dirty brown and green from candy cakes, flowers and herbs that the devotees toss in as offerings.
A subtle stink rises from within forcing one to make a retreat.
O, where are the aesthetics we often brag about, where the sense and sensibility!

Indira Nagar

Is this Indira Nagar where I lived, re-christened Iqbal Colony by the fervent faithful to whom the Hindu sounding name was like a red rag to the bull?

It seems right in retrospect, for now I see Muslim nameplates on the erstwhile Hindu gates.

More guesthouses have come up here, and more floors added to houses that have risen up and up filling the vacant land and air, the sky blotted out of view, the street choked with vehicles, and noise, dust and smoke spread like a pall of gloom over this once quiet neighborhood.

I cannot recognize my house, outflanked and dwarfed by others that have sprung up all round.

Yes, it is just a house, a ghost of what it used to be;
no longer the home where my children grew up, my father practiced law, my mother indulged guests, and my wife and I doctored the sick with compassion and zest.

The garden has turned into a marsh, stink and desultoriness ruling the roast, the lawn taken over by wild grass, the flowers by weeds!

O where are the roses and sunflowers; where the marigolds and the mums that bloomed here in wild abundance; where the creeper and the vine, where the poplar and the pine?

The neighbors have filled their lots, and raised their ground levels, their effluent gravitating into mine turning it into a receptacle for waste and brine.

The ground floor is dark and wet, dampness rising to the bare walls, and the paint peeling off everywhere.
The floors are stripped of matting, the doors cracked and creaking, the curtain-less windows a squeaking, the bathrooms stained and stinking.

The living room looks sepulchral, the kitchen fallen silent for ever.

Our bedrooms look like dingy cells, the clinic a forgotten refuge of patients, the thokur kuth an archeological curiosity and the icons, idols and images of gods gathering the dust and rust of time.

The power lines are in tatters, the plumbing has run into rot, the furniture and fixtures are all but gone, gone the view of the Shankarachariya hill, of Mahadev and the Zabarwan range, gone too the archives and the library, gone the paintings and the photo gallery!

What remains is just a memory.

No, this house cannot be my home, for home is where the hearth is, hearth is where there is warmth, warmth is where there is life and love.
This place is lifeless, loveless and cold, and filled with an overwhelming absence - of the house deity, of the inmates, of the very soul that makes a home.

When I started from Jammu
I asked Leela if she had any message.
"I pine for Kashmir," she said with feeling,
"Say my hi everywhere you go," and, as an after thought, she said, "Kiss each brick of my home that I so much miss."
She had literally and metaphorically overseen this home rise brick by brick, like the birds their nest, feather by feather.
No, I will not waste her sacred kisses after witnessing this desecration of her nest.

A Night at Circuit House

It feels so strange to be sleeping a night out in this guest house, while my own home, just a mile away, beckons me to its once warm bosom.

All my life, since I was born, this will be the first night ever that I sleep under an alien roof.

Sharing this room with a stranger (I did not know Mohan Singh before; he is another awardee who writes in Hindi), is another first-time experience.
I envy him his blessed sleep that came to him instantly the moment he turned off his bed light while I kept tossing till midnight.
I swallowed a sleeping pill, and yet could barely manage a wink, only to be woken up soon after by the sudden blaring of the loud speaker that pierced through the open window from a mosque across the river.

Thankfully, the huge Chinars dammed the pitch a little bit, but, at the first glow of dawn, the kites on the Chinars took over and, soon after, a clutch of crows joined the chorus.

With the first rays of the sun the sky came to, and the river too, and I quietly slipped out for a long morning stroll in the lawns of the guest house and along the river bank, that used to be my favorite haunt.

The subtle fragrance of the roses - yellow, white and pink - breezed into me and chased weariness away, but it were the golden marigolds, the marigold of Kashmiri vintage, that gladdened my heart as never before and brought back the spirit of devotion, for, they have always remained an invariable article of our religious tradition.

I picked one and tossed it in the water as my offering to the vale of Kashmir.

Day Two

Saturday, 4 October 2008

(On a Cross-country Drive)

Rauf arrives 7 AM on the dot.
On empty stomachs, we trot off.
There is little time to lose and long distance to traverse - the distance of eighteen years in just a few hours - before the award ceremony begins at three.

Jawaharlal Nehru College for Women

We drive along the cricket stadium to the Residency Road, to the famous Regal Chowk and on to the Maulana Azad Road.

There has never been any objection to a street, park or an institution being named after a Muslim in beloved Kashmir, even it be of a non-Kashmiri like that of the Maulana, after whom this road is named.

But, passing by the College for Women, I still do not see the celebrated name of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru on the hoarding at the gate - a name that should have been cherished by every Kashmiri in so many ways.
For, not only was he a son of the soil, and the first Prime Minister of India, but he also gave Jammu and Kashmir her special, semi-autonomous status, that bestowed on her a more than equal rank in the nation.
Yet, when this College for Women was rechristened after his name, the violent protests did not stop till the proposition was dropped.

O, what intolerance!

What ingratitude!

Does it not call for a deeper study of the warped Kashmiri psyche?

My Parental Home

We turn right along the S P College Lane, famously called 'love lane' that led to my parental home, where I lived for twenty years, the home which carries in its breast a part of my life, the very best.

At the gate, Rauf asks me if I would like to go in and see?
He does not know that we have sold off the property already.

We had resisted the sale for more than a decade while it had turned into a caravanserai where people came and went away, some carrying off a heirloom, others leaving a mess behind.

Before it was finally sold, seven families, unknown to me, and to each other unknown, had made it their abode, while a part of its beautiful lawn had been sliced off by the neighbour and merged with his own.

My fervent pleas and petitions to the powers that be, to secure and restore my estate, had fallen on deaf ears.

It was then that I was constrained to sell it for a song before the other neighbours too eyed their share of slices and swallowed all of it for free.

No, I have no heart to go in, to see the desecration and ruin of a dear home that nurtured me, a home where I welcomed my bride and raised a loving family.

I have no desire to meet the new owner to ask how my home fared under his care.
I still smart under the guilt and shame of abandoning her for reasons whatever.

I heave a long and cold sigh, and kiss this home a goodbye.

Ramchander Temple

On the left, just opposite the gate of my home, it is shocking to find the vivisection of Ramchander Temple - the front yard sliced off and merged with the road, exposing the temple to the traffic, its sanctity violated, and the sanctum laid bare like a maiden stripped off her gear.

But, this is not the first time that we have been forced to sacrifice the symbols of our faith for the common good, and to buy peace with the neighbourhood.

This was no inconsequential temple, (no temple really can be) but one of the most sanctified, where we held festivals each year, in Spring and in fall, during the nine days of Ramanavami, and picnicked in the sprawling lawns, sharing sheerchai and telewaroos, nadermunjas and pakoras.

Here, children played in the yard, blowing conchs and wooden whistles, flying gas balloons and kites, while the elders prayed inside.

I have no heart to go in and seek a darshan, for I will have a lot to answer to the deities inside that we worshipped every day, and a lot to hear from them.

Barbarshah

I ask Rauf to drive on, soon to cross the Barbarshah bridge across the dying Chunth kol now like a faded green ribbon, as duckweed hides the shame of a once beautiful dame.

on to Nai Sarak, where many boys offered arrest during that historic agitation when a Pandit girl, Parmeshwari, escaped with a Muslim boy and was converted to Islam forcibly.

That, alas, was the turning point from where there was no looking back, as the State administration geared itself to teach Pandits a lesson, and, through discriminatory legislations, punitive orders, and proclamations, applied the squeeze, forcing us into a silent exodus till the militants took over and did the rest.

Habba Kadal

We turn right to Habba Kadal, once the hub of Kashmiri Pandits, their cultural center, their identity,
their pride.

Alas, I do not find a single Pandit in the two chowks on its two ends, none crossing the bridge either, or watching the river on whose shores we grew up and our culture thrived.

I recall how,
on mornings like this,
the place would be alive with people and a bustling center of activity.

Early shoppers - ladies with dejhairs hanging from their ears and bindis dotting their foreheads - would haggle with the vegetables vendors and flock near the dairy stores for milk, yoghurt and fresh cheese.
Their men in turbans and pherons would queue for hot loaves from bakers, others asking the butchers for tender cuts, and yet others shopping for Kangris, and for readymade winter garments from the hawkers on the pavements.

What presents now is a sad spectacle, a rickety curvy cadaverous bridge, empty streets and shuttered shops, and spectral houses with busted gates crying for their missing inmates.

A languorous vapor covers the surface of the river, as if to hide from view the tragic story she wants to tell, of blood and gore,
and of her shame.

O, where is the famous clinic where Leela's father, Dr. Chogtu, practiced medicine, treating all his patients free, lending a touch of his spirituality?
Where is the famous bookshop of the flat-nosed Muka Mazeir, where we traded old books for new, year after year after year, when we moved a grade higher?
Where is Taraq Halvai's tuck shop where we snacked together on his boiled-potatoes- in-yogurt special, on our way back from school, often cheating him for a serving or two?

Kanya Kadal

We turn right and along, and, just before the Kanya Kadal Bridge, I see the portly milkmaid's shop on the left of the road in a deep-set corner where it has been ever since I remember.
She held her customers in awe of her temper, selling all mix of milk and water, and second-grade adulterated cheese, that still tasted better than elsewhere!

We cross the bridge over the Kiti Kol, a flood diversion canal, like the Chunt Kol, from the river uptown to the river downtown - two of the several channels dredged centuries ago to save the main body of the city from floods that often ravaged her.

The canals, like the Nalei Maer, that gave the city a Venetian flavor in days of our childhood, are fast turning into drains and gutters, and receptacles for the town's waste.

It makes me wonder that while the Kashmiris are so zealous about their right to self-administer, how ruthlessly they are guiding the valley on a mindless, self-destructive course with their culture of greed and grab that impels them on a ruthless spree of filling up the water bodies, nibbling at verdant lands and forests, and knocking down the hillocks, expropriating every inch of available space?

Pray, how is India to blame for this State-sponsored vandalism, this unabashed incest of paradise?

My Clinic at Chotta Bazar

On the left is Chotta Bazar that always used to be the hub of raging separatists, Islamists and religious bigots, who sought every opportunity to create a ruckus and disturb the fragile peace between communities.

It was here I practiced medicine for more than twenty years.
It was here I had to deal with these rabble rousers who looked for the flimsiest excuse to hold you to ransom for being what you were - a Kashmiri Pandit ready to please.

They once held me hostage because I couldn't examine a woman who happened to walk in just when I had closed the clinic and was in a hurry to attend to an emergency.

Angry mobs besieged me instantly, charging me of being a Hindu chauvinist who refused to examine a Muslim patient, raising slogans that rent the air against the whole Pandit community - expletives I had never heard before, abuse that one could barely stand.
They stoned my window panes; they broke the windshield of my car; they gheraoed me for a full hour and would not let go till the police arrived and the inspector apologized on my behalf to restore order.

That was how unruliness prevailed in the better days of yore.
That was how cases were decided - the victims asking for pardon and the criminals walking free!
Now that the bashing boys have been banished from here, the fanatics and hate-mongers will have to sort it out amongst each other.

It is with a mixed feeling I look at the windows of my clinic that was seized soon after I left, not unlike the mass taking over of our leftover properties.

It is heart-wrenching to visit your home that has been vandalized and ruined; it is humiliating to enter a temple that has been defiled and desecrated; but it is a knock-out feeling to find your workplace usurped.

For an unexplained reason, a sense of renunciation fills my heart, and I feel sorry for them for tainting their hearts and hands with the crime of snatching others' bread and homestead.

I ask Rauf to drive on via Karan Nagar to Chattabal, and on to Safakadal, across the river, where my younger sister ran a busy practice till she left in that wave of mass exodus with the rest of us.

She has wandered ever since in a vain bid to resettle - in Gurgaon, Delhi, Hyderabad - agonizing over lost years of work, pining for home that was burnt down soon after she left.

Like my wife and me, she was in the Medical College faculty, giving her best to the community.

That, alas, is the story of all of us!

Eidgah

We drive from there to, what were, the sprawling grounds of Eidgah, where our rivals settled scores for losing cricket matches against us by physically beating us in return, while we bravely fought back even as we were vastly outnumbered.

Were match-fixing known then we would never have considered losing the contests to them to escape the violence, for we loved to win at all costs.

It is on the land here in Eidgah that Tibetan refugees were settled and assimilated in the cultural milieu because they were Muslims even as we, the indigenous people, have been uprooted and cast away, because we are not.

I often fail to understand, how a religion that preaches compassion can truly bind people of an alien stock when its votaries strive to extirpate people of the their own flock because they belong to a different faith?.

Vicharnag

We drive on to Vicharnag, that famed religious center of Pandits around which a whole culture thrived, now lying abandoned and forlorn, a wasteland,
a relic of its glorious past!

It was here, by the side of this hallowed Spring, seven kilometers from the city, where scholars would spend a lifetime to deliberate (vichar) and to study.

that the almanacs were written year after year, that guided the everyday lives of people throughout the calendar year.

that students came from far and near to learn in the company of scholars, saints and seers.

It was here,
in the sprawling precincts, under tall poplars and mighty Chinars that devotees flocked to pay obeisance.

that the Kashmiri New Year was ushered in every year with great fanfare.

Now, there is not a soul around when it should have been abuzz with pilgrims and morning worshippers, for it was here that the terrorists struck first and murdered the high priest, way back in nineteen eighty eight.
Then there was no looking back.

Alas, this fount of knowledge, this ancient seat of learning, this epicenter of discourse, is now like a blot in the landscape.

The spring, nearly 35 feet square, that once sparkled with nectar has turned into a cesspool - dirty grey weed choking it within, blobs of moss floating on top, and stink rising from the surface, threatening to suffocate.
Where a bath once did rejuvenate, I dare not dip even my finger lest it contaminate.

The carvings on the stones that lined the spring - sculptures of gods and goddesses - are all smudged with pigment and moss.
The Badrapeeth in the middle with Siva mounted in full splendor is to be seen nowhere.
Have they taken a plunge in shame, or satiated the thirst of an iconoclast?

The temple that housed our gods has now become their tomb.
The dharamshala is a ghost house, sans doors, sans windows, sans people - a haunt for languorous pigeons, now fluttering, now cooing, and now making love, oblivious of the desolation below.

A strange sense of nudity prevails here, a shame that I desperately feel like hiding.
The sprawling lawn has turned into a bog, with sewage seeping in from houses all around that besiege the place in a viselike grip.
Soon, they may take the place over and convert it into another khanakah as they did centuries ago . . . with the abode of goddess Kali on the right bank of the Vitasta.

Dear Vicharnag,
you, that once epitomized our scholarship and culture, now symbolize its death and decay!

Dear Vicharnag,
as I stand in front of you taking the desolation in, the solitary Chinar sheds its leaves in the cheerless autumn breeze, like tears from my eyes.
We both weep at your tragic demise.

As I stand here, stunned and speechless and look at the ruins helplessly for an answer to my query: Is this the end of our culture, of what we valued and held so dear, Rauf looks at me in sympathy and I motion to him that it is time to move on to a place that may help dispel my somber mood.

Rauf's Home

Straight we drive to his new home, his own, with a garden patch in front.

With what pride he leads me into his two-storey cottage to show me around - the three bedrooms,
a traditional kitchen with modern gadgets, a lobby that combines a dinning space, a furnished room for his mother, bathrooms, balconies, balustrades.

Were he alive,
his father would have been a proud man!

His well-groomed kids - a son and a daughter - salaam me with great respect and affectionately address me as Dadu.

To be addressed thus, because I had been their Dadu's friend, is flattering no doubt, and a sobering thought that the culture we once prided in still survives somewhere in this blighted land, once hallowed by a long tradition of spirituality and syncretism.

Sitting on the carpeted floor, we breakfast on loaves of bread - hot and fresh from the baker's oven, battered, peppered and salted.

O, how I relish the tea from a traditional samovar that I miss in exile like so many simple joys that came from living in Kashmir.

In an emotional parting, Rauf's mother blesses me,
"May Kahnove protect you and your family."

I avoid looking at her, for I can not hide back a tear, that I would not like someone to see who looks up to me as her brother.

Rauf's Sister

It is to the house of Rauf's sister that we now speed fast.

This is another emotional reunion with a woman I had last blessed when she was a lovely bride, now graying at her temples and a mother of two – a son, gentle and respectful, pursuing an MBA career, and a daughter, graduating in Biotech, pretty and demure,
with an outlook soundly secular.

They proudly show me their certificates like they would to their own grandfather, sharing with me their visions and goals, their hopes about their future.

They are the other side of the story here, of young men and women who would like to go about their lives unscathed by the militant creed.

Suddenly, I become sentimental:

"It is girls like you who make us proud, who refused to be bludgeoned into submission, who braved the acid attacks and abuse, who dared the false purveyors of religion.

It is you that are the hope of this land; it is on your promises that exiles like me might be tempted back to the valley."

"Insha Allah," shouted the boy.

"Amen," muttered the girl.

Another tearful departure, like from my own daughter.

"Come back," they call out, when I settle in the car.

I do not look back at them;

just wave my hand

as we drive away.

How unbecoming it sounds to betray the tide of tender emotion to the younger generation.

Ganesha

We are soon at the Shahi Darwaza, the main gate that leads you within the wide boundary wall, (famously known as the Kalai) that was built long ago in stone masonry and lime around the Hari Parbat fort and the vast stretches of land that sloped down the foothills.

As children, we often walked the wall (our own version of the Great Wall) on our way to pay obeisance to the pantheon of gods within the precincts, or to play cricket, football and hockey in the vast tracts of fallow of land that I find obliterated now with mushroom human habitation.

A few leaps from the gate is a nondescript structure that merges with the hill, the famous Ganesha Temple.

I have come for my salutations to this elephant-headed god, the fount of wisdom, whom we always invoke when we begin a day or a new task.

This is the same Ganesha where the devotees flocked every morning, where bells never ceased to chime and the sound of conchs echoed from the craggy hill, where the smell of incense wafted to the blue sky above.

Inside the temple, the pilgrims would jostle for space to light a lamp, offer a flower, and chant a hymn and a prayer.

Others who could not get in vied with each other, as they queued in the lane outside the temple, sticking their arms through the window, pleading with the priests sitting inside to tie a naerband on their wrists, to daub their foreheads with vermilion, and to pour a spoonful into their cupped hands of the sacramental water that they would gratefully quaff and feel blessed.

Today, there is an eerie hush and stark emptiness - the temple bolted from inside and not a soul anywhere around.
A police constable in mufti, whom I mistake for the priest, opens the door for me and disappears quickly, possibly, I think,
to get puja paraphernalia ready.

To savor each moment of the audience and make up for lost years of idolatry I enter the temple gingerly - a low-ceilinged room at the base of the Hari Parbat hill, built around an irregular mound flanking the northern slope.

Smeared with deep vermilion, the mound of rock here is naturally shaped like the potbellied Ganesha with an elephant head and a curled trunk, who has evoked such adulation down the ages.

But, now, the rock is defaced and laid bare, the image tarnished beyond repair, and dear Ganesha, deserted by his devotees, looking worn, forlorn and melancholy.

A lingum of Siva nearby is parched and dry, for there is none to wash him with milk and water, none to adorn him with a flower.

The windows of the room are shut, shafts of light piercing through the chinks create an eerie spectacle within.
Cobwebs weave gossamer patterns in the crevices, cornices and corners and mice scurry on the floors.
A bleak ceiling stares at you, and a stifling silence echoes from the bare walls.

The lamps are wickless and dry, the bells have fallen silent, there are no hymns to the gods, and there are no flowers, no frankincense.

I stand dumb and stupefied,
taking the desolation in,
melting with the shame of having deserted my gods, yet, posing a question in return: Why did they prove gods of clay and left their devotees no choice but to leave everything behind and run for their lives.

I open a window to look outside at the lane that led us to an undulating trail round the Hari Parbat hill along the foot hills and through almond orchards, to the temples of our pantheon of gods that hallowed this land – Haeri, Sharika and Sapt Rishi, Devi Angan and Chakreshwar.
But, I do not find any trace of the lane which has been assimilated into a private backyard, where a lady is sweeping a verandah.
She looks at me, all smiles, and greets me with a namaskar, inviting me come have a cup of tea.
I salaam her back gratefully, shutting the window again.

Even the Hari Parbat hill has been renamed Kohi Maran by the powers that be that are on a name changing spree.
That is how Shankaracharya hill has been named Suleiman Teng, and Anantnag of innumerable springs, as Islamambad.
How artificial and unnatural the new names sound to the ear, like naming London as Jeddah and Paris as Medinah!

As I begin to withdraw from here, loathe to leave the gods alone in that cold, closed chamber, gathering the dust and moss of time, and fading slowly into obscurity, the man who opened the temple door reappears, now in a police uniform, and bolts the door behind me.
It is then that I realize he was no priest, but a sentry on duty!

Makhdoom Sahib

We take a short drive to Kathi Darwaza (the second big gate to the precincts), from where a new flight of stairs, that I had never seen before, takes us to the imposing shrine of the celebrated Makhdoom Sahib.

It is a lovely sight from the stairs.
On the right, the slopes uphill, with dense new plantations, look beautiful.

At the top, the fort is ever sublime, its ramparts renovated in red lime.

The Afgani mosque in fading brown stone sits on a plateau at a lower level from the shrine, and flanks the stairs on the left overlooking the Malakhah, the sprawling public cemetery that would fill fear in everybody.

I am reminded of a childhood lore about this public burial ground, that ghosts with lights on their heads beguiled wayfarers during nights, and skeletons popped up from the graves and robbed them of their belongings!

that the Afghani mosque is being restored to its pristine glory.
He speaks of another mosque inside the Hari Parbat fort that people want rebuilt.

Well, I have not seen, I tell him, nor heard of a mosque inside the fort but just a small temple of Durga where we used to worship on every Nuareh and Baisaki, when the fort was thrown open for the general public.

"A mosque there has always been that is almost extinct now, partly from the ravages of time and partly from the abuse of soldiers camping inside the fort," he insists.
What of the temple, I ask?
Well, if there was one, they should renovate that too, he replies,
his tone consolatory!

I think with myself:
The legend of Hari Parbat hill and the pantheon of Hindu gods on it is interwoven with the Kashmiri Pandits, the aborigines of Kashmir since eons.

The fort came much later, built by the Afghan Duranis, who would only have build a mosque and the temple must have come after when the Dogra Hindus took over.
No doubt, there is enough space Both for a temple and a mosque, but more importantly, when will we rise above the mosque and mandir controversy that has created bad blood everywhere and sullied the image of our country.

The shrine of Makhdoom Sahib, the venerated Muslim saint, is accessed through two long flights of stairs, from the north and the south.
It is a splendid two-storey structure standing on several pillars on the southern slope of the hill, amid a large sprawling complex of bathrooms, corridors, prayer halls, and a huge courtyard paved with chiseled stones.

When you come to think of it, this shrine with a magnificent design has come up right on top of the unpretentious Ganesha, the most revered of Hindu temples.
Is it all by sheer coincidence that they built and superimposed on our gods and deities - be it during the despotic rule of the fanatical Muslim kings, be it during the secular democracy that Kashmir is now supposed to be?

Helpless, we make do with the replicas and clones that we have built in our exile of our temples and shrines.

We console ourselves that in the context of our faith the structures do not really matter, for we see god everywhere - in each individual and in each living creature.

We see Him
as much in a mosque as in our temples, as much in this dargah as in our hearts.

Even the dumb stones speak god to us and we worship the earth and the oceans, the trees, rivers and mountains, the sun, stars and springs.

I find many believers here, men, women and children, praying, shedding tears, tying knots, their faces lit up in faith.

But I fail to understand how one faith can thrive on the damnation of another; how can love for one nourish on hatred for the other?

There is nothing wrong in any faith as such, yet, it is often the faithful who turn their faith into frenzy and bring a bad name to it.

We climb down the northern stairs to where they meet Ganesha again.
I see the same baker's shop as when I was a little boy, from where I would buy bagels and feed the street mongrels that never seemed to have their fill.
I see their progeny now, tails wagging at me, as if in recognition from bygone days.
They jump at the morsels I toss at them that they catch in their mouths with the same ease and finesse.
Verily, inconstancy is a human trait whose loyalties change so often so fast, while animals remain ever so steadfast.

In my childhood, mother would thrust me with loose change and a pocketful of rice to give away in alms to the beggars that lined the two sides of the street from the main road to the Ganesha temple.
Thankfully, I see no beggars today; they seem to have followed the devotees to their exile all the way!

Pokhribal

Saddened by Ganesha's state I have no heart to visit Chakreshwar and the other temples around the hill when the traditional access is denied, the walkways assimilated by neighbours, and the gods besieged and hemmed in.

Yet, I decide to visit Pokhribal on the backwaters of the lake Dal, a lovely spring and an old temple we frequented in summer so often, to drink of the water and enjoy a swim during our teenage escapades.

We pass through a security check and walk inside the sprawling estate now turned into a fortification, a sanctuary for an army contingent.

The people in towns and hamlets, sore about Indian military presence, have denied them space anywhere, driving them into the last refuge – the left-over properties of Pandits and their temples and estates, that have survived the terrorist deluge.

I enter the sanctum sanctorum to find it dark, dingy and in disrepair, the walls pasted with tattered pictures of gods and goddesses on calendars, the idols a picture of utter neglect.

The spring looks like a cesspool, the water so murky and opaque that you refuse to believe it is the same nectar that we drank tumbler after tumbler and never seemed to have our fill.

The army personnel, for a change, appear quite carefree and relaxed, washing, showering, oiling themselves, others enjoying a cup of tea, and yet others lazing around, their radios tuned to film songs.

It is not for me to grudge them a break from their strenuous duties, but, are they not rather negligent of the gods inside Pokhribal?

With the army on guard, or without, our temples and shrines, no doubt, have run into a state of utter ruin, the gods unattended and forgotten.

Who is worse off, I wonder - the gods here sans their flock, or the flock in exile sans their gods?

A Hurricane Drive

We drive out of Pokhribal fast along Nauhatta and Jamai Masjid, to Nalei Maer and Saraf Kadal, to Bohri Kadal and Baba Demb - my favourite haunts of yore, that I can barely recognize now.

I feel sad about Baba Demb, the once lovely lagoon that has turned into a marsh.
It is disappearing fast, Rauf tells me, into the greedy gullets of the guzzlers of water-bodies and the pot bellies of the poachers of land.
If they could, rues he, they would even swallow the sky.

It is from Baba Demb we would board a Donga for school picnics to Nishat and Shalimar.
It is from here we sailed to the tiny atoll that housed the Bhairav of Mangleshwar.

Sadly, Mangleshwar too suffers from utter neglect and ruin like the other institutions and temples of the exiled Pandits.

This quaint little islet has turned into a swamp and the Bhairav is deserted and sad, a place of pilgrimage no more.

I ask Rauf to drive me on to the most cherished place, the place I think about so often in my musings in exile - my ancestral home in Rajveri Kadal.

Rajveri Kadal

How sweet you sound to the ear; what memories your name revives!

Rajveri Kadal!

I have carried you in my heart ever since I sprang from you, and played in your lap.

It all seems like yesterday!

Yet, when I am back
after nearly two decades, I can barely recognize you, for there is very little left here except your name.

But who knows, you too might receive a new name in the rush to rename places, institutions and landmarks, and to rewrite the history of Kashmir?

There are no landmarks left that would vouch for you in the changed landscape of this place.

Nalei Maer, (the canal that cut through you and gave you a distinct identity) in which we fished and swam, was filled up long back, and the arched bridge of stone across it lives only in memory.

How often we lazed on the brick parapet listening to the gentle cadence of boats in the water flowing by and watching the swarms of crows cutting across the sky, as we discussed, debated and devised our adventures for the next day.

Where is the mound in the square that marked the grave of a forgotten fakir where children often sat together to draw inspiration from his folklore?

Where is the public tap outside my home, that 24-hour fount of cool water sweeter than I remember, that grand confluence of the neighbourhood where women washed, bathed and gossiped, and there never was an argument?

Where are my loving neighbours - the Gujris, Hajis, and Hajams; the Khans, Mirs and Maulivis - who pampered us quite a bit because ours was a solitary Pandit home in the whole Muslim neighbourhood?

Where are the cowherds and milkmaids, the cap makers, the barbers, and where the fishmongers that drew swarms of shoppers to make you so famous, dear old Rajveri Kadal?

Neither do I find the chemist here, nor the tobacconist, nor the butcher.
My father smoked no other tobacco when we moved residence miles away, nor bought mutton anywhere except from the family butcher here.
The dhobi and the barber from dear old Rajveri Kadal came to offer their services wherever we moved residence.
Such was the attachment with the place, such was the bonding with people.

The maze of lanes that I knew like the lines on my palm and walked blindfolded upon, are nowhere in evidence.
O, how they connected me to people and places; how often have I roamed them in my imagination in exile!

O, where is our lawn with flower beds that my father nurtured with passion?
Where is the vegetables farm that we tended with great care?
Where is the sprawling backyard in which the cowherds dumped dung and spread it out to dry in round flat loaves and dung cakes, that served as ready fuel for the hearth and the kangri.

It was there in that backyard we played football and cricket and held contests with rival teams?
I do not understand how and why those friendly contests between us and the neighbours could have turned into deadly conquests and swept us off our land hurling us into exile.

O, where is the deep well in our vegetable farm, deeper than I ever remember, from which we drew pails of water for a cool bath in summer?

Remember, dear Rajveri Kadal, when a cousin once fell into the well and was pulled out unscathed, by a valiant Muslim neighbour?
Far from demanding a service fee, he was too humble and shy even to accept our gratitude; such was the fraternal spirit that knit our communities.

Remember, how she giggled (as if she had taken a pleasurable plunge) when she found the whole neighborhood praying for her with bated breath, as the milkmaids beat their chests and the children wept and wailed?

All I see of my ancestral house that had braved the tides of time for nearly a century, and had birthed me and five generations of my dynasty, is a small mound of earth!

They have hacked you down, my dear home - nibbled at you, taken you away, brick by brick, and plank by plank, stripped the papyrus and shingle off your roof, gouged the doors and windows out, dug out the plumbing, pulled away the wiring, and even scooped away the mud!

What a dream house you were, beautifully architected, with a high plinth and a proud façade, built with ancient Maharaji-bricks, khutamband ceilings and lattice windows, and a second floor balcony that stretched far out in space like a wharf on the sea!

Can loot be ever so complete?
An earthquake, a flood, a bomb blast leaves a wreck in its wake; arson leaves behind its telltale signs of ashes, cinders and debris; but this here is total plunder, a clean up procedure, leaving behind not a trace of history.

All that remains is a mound of earth like an unmarked, unsung grave.
Dust thou were, my dear home, unto dust hast thou returned.

Is there someone watching, and about to stop me, as I scoop a clod of the dust : from where I have sprung - to take it back with me as the last relic of my past?

Gone with my first home is also a larger part of me.
O, why did I undertake this journey if it was only to carry back the humiliation and hurt of a golden period of my life?

My Elementary School

We drive three furlongs to Budger to rediscover my primary school where I learnt the three Rs and picked my childhood friends – more Muslims than Pandits.

In that age, we were blissfully unaware of separate identities, there being nothing like 'them' and 'us', and the teachers poured their soul to impart the best of humanities.
The Maulvi taught Urdu and Arabic, and the Panditji taught Sanskrit and Hindi; the former was also the muezzin, the latter also the temple priest, and the morning azan from the mosque and the chimes of bells from the temple rang together in a soulful melody of brotherhood and coexistence.

Alas, neither there is the school now, nor the memory of those times!

Like my home, the school is yet another casualty to the frenzy of Azadi.
I am told,
it had to be burnt down, for, education could wait when Azadi was at stake, and the boys had to wield the gun in place of the pen.

As we drive to Ali Kadal nearby, I draw another cold sigh for I shudder to think that a similar fate might have befallen my Rangteng High.

Along the way
I try to recall and locate the house of Ved Lal, my father's associate, of Nilakanth Bazaz, his lifelong friend, of Gopi Nath, his rummy playing mate, of Bansilal, my classmate, and of so many others – friends, relatives, and neighbours.

I can't find anyone here in the changed topography.
Some have passed away, others have moved on, yet others remain unknown to the new generation – the new breed that now lives in what remains of those homes.

The new Ali Kadal Bridge looks surprisingly alien, and does not seem to connect.
The old was so familiar, and imposing in its obsolescence!

The baker's shop in the corner, from whom I would buy every morning hot loaves of bread for the family (so much mouth-watering were they I would munch a couple on the way), is nowhere in evidence.
No one knows where the baker fled and whether he is living or dead.

Wherever you inquire, the Kashmiri Pandits are spoken of in past tense here - they were,
they have been,
they had been.
Who were they, anyway, they might ask, one day?

Karan Nagar

This predominantly Pandit mohalla has got a complete makeover since it was taken over after they fled.

A quiet residential neighborhood has morphed into a commercial center - multi-rise buildings having come up everywhere, and a car bazaar is buzzing where domestic peace prevailed earlier.

The arched gate of the Medical College beckons me as before.

Should I or should I not enter inside this dear institution where I spent the best years of my life, as a physician and teacher?

The impulse is stronger than reason and I ask Rauf to drive in.

Students, doctors and nurses I see, not one that I can place, not a face that turns towards me, for it is 18 years since I left when most of them were kids and some not even born.

My generation has moved on and the new generation does not even know my name.

I am no more than a non-entity in a place that was like a second home, where I worked for a quarter century; a place that resonates inside me.

I hear the echo from that time when chants of Jihad rent the air and the medicos came out in processions skipping lectures and ward rounds!
It was a strange frenzy that had caught the imagination of students, nurses and the faculty who would skip their duty for the mirage of Azadi.

A group of inspired students came to my chamber one of those days, soliciting my participation as a faculty member in a protest march they had organized to the local office of the U N Military Observers Group.

I snubbed them for neglecting the patients and trashing their studies in favour of the politics of protests, but lost quite some winks of sleep for the possible consequences at the hands of my own students!

I ask Rauf to turn back, for, beyond fond memories, this place holds no interest for me, even as I spent my prime here and endeavored to give my best to my patients and students, trying to impart the values of life beyond the art of healing.

What place for values and ideals where religious bigotry holds sway, where divisions and discord prevail over reason and rationality?

Lal Chowk

We drive out of the Medical College, along the familiar Dewan Bagh road, to the Shali Store and Exhibition Grounds and up along the new flyover to the famous Lal Chowk, the Red Square of Srinagar that has always been the Kurukheshtra for the many agitations and uprisings, a rallying place for the mass hysteria that is stirred up from time to time.

Lal Chowk has once again come to symbolize the smoldering sickness that consumes Kashmir as the shadows loom large of the proposed long march on Monday, the 6th of October.

The separatists, who have given the call for people to herd in Lal Chwok, are an unenviable bunch of malcontents who, every often, raise banners of revolt, inflicting endless shutdowns and hartals, bringing life in the valley to a grinding halt.

They are glib fundamentalists, who thrive on the religious sentiments of the gullible Kashmiri masses and drive them like herds of sheep into a self-destructive course, flaunting wild dreams of Nizame Mustafa and Azadi.

Pray, what is this Azadi all about except a freedom from free thought, from progress, from reason, from tolerance, from syncretism?

An eerie hush has descended on Lal Chowk like a prelude to a tragedy, even as the shops are open, and people go about their business; no sign whatever of the turbulence underneath.

Is it the lull before the storm?

There are a few bunkers in evidence, and fewer soldiers at vantage positions, their faces eager to befriend, even as they are ready to defend.

Gagribal - Buchwar

On along the old Polo Grounds to the foothills of Shankaracharya again for a short stop at Gagribal to buy a box of apples for the Wakhlus.

Why are apples here, in this land of Delicious and Ambri, more expensive, and almost double the price, than in Jammu, I wonder.

The Kashmir trader was always notorious for cheating and making a quick buck, but the greed seems to have grown manifold and the grab culture got a big boost in spite of the ferment of religious piety!

That reminds me that it was here at Gagribal that the Income Tax officials who had flown from New Delhi to uncover the black money of the big hoteliers and businessmen, were humiliated, hounded and beaten up?
The papers, files and documents that they had seized from the defaulters were thrown in the lake Dal by the crowds who were made to believe that India was taxing the Kashmiris.

That was in more peaceful times, before terrorism had raised its ugly head, but ever since, the Central agencies, be it of the Income Tax or the Sales Tax, dare not even contemplate raiding the defaulters in Kashmir.

For that matter, during the worst years of militancy, the people would not even bother to pay the bills of electricity and water.

On to Buchwar, to Wakhlu's who are waiting to host us lunch.
A single Pandit family for miles around, they come to spend the summer here under the long shadow of gun culture, to escape the scorching Indian summer that has scorched the soul of the exiles.

Over many pleasantries with this genial couple (my younger daughter is married to their son) we take a quick lunch and a cup of tea when my brother phones from London, eager to know how I fare while on my visit here.

He has left the valley five decades earlier, yet, London is only a surrogate home, while his soul resides here.

He registers every event in the valley with a far greater intensity than those who live it directly.

Such is the longing for roots, such is the pull of homeland!

I tell him what I feel like - a stranger on home turf - even as I reassure him that I feel quite secure, and that I will be inking my impressions in a travel diary, for all to see.

The Award Function

A magnificent institution, the Sheri Kashmir Convention Center is like another fading jewel in the lap of the mountains on the shores of the lake Dal.

Sprawling lawns merge with the lake that reflects the mountains in a mirror image, but deftly hides the new breed of wild that infest the high ranges here - displacing the rare species of Hangul, black bear and tiger - a wilder breed that wield the guns, a breed whose writ still runs.
No surprise, therefore, that the place is bustling with policemen, and entry to the convention center is only after a due identification.

The auditorium is grand, the podium well decorated, the gathering large in spite of the fear in the air.

Shri N N Vohra, the Governor arrives without much fanfare and the ceremony begins soon after.

In his welcome address, the Secretary rattles out a long wish list for more favours for the Academy and more funds from New Delhi..

A group song of welcome – boys in kurtas and shalwars, girls in white frocks and dupptas, (surprisingly, all bare headed) – sets the tone of the function.

One by one,
the awardees are invited to the stage, their profile is read out and the Governor felicitates them in turn with a Shawl and a cheque, a clock and a memento.

The awards over, the Governor, in his address, grants all the wishes of the secretary, like the boons that a benevolent deity, quick to please the suppliant, bestows with, "So be it."

Yet, nothing ever seems to satiate the insatiable Kashmiri appetite – no boons, no grants, no bonanzas, no freebies.

And nothing helps to bring them closer to the Indian nation - neither the high altitude rail link nor the international airport, neither the Koshur Channel nor Akash Vani, neither the special status nor Article 370.

All her wealth might India shower and bestow all her love and care, the Kashmiri heart is elsewhere.
Alas, it is a one-way love affair!

I don't know the Governor personally, but, his dignified bearing, and the tone and tenor of his address speak of a genuine person who would like to pull Kashmir out of the present impasse after the Amarnath Yatra controversy - the Kashmiris paranoid and unyielding, the Jammuites rebellious and angry.
He took over as the Governor just when the valley was on fire, yet, he lost no time to don the role of a firefighter.

I wish him luck in his endeavor to quell the fires of discord and win the people over.
That he stuck to the date and time for this award function, in the face of the raging storm, speaks a lot about his determination.

Dinner with the Dhars

As the evening draws near, we return to the Circuit house, and Dr. Dhar arrives soon after to pick me in his car.

I am visiting the Dhars first time in Srinagar since his son and my daughter tied the nuptial knot far away in Delhi three months after the exodus.
Kashmir was out of bounds then for a wedding celebration.

It is a veritable botanical garden with the flora special to Kashmir that they can boast of here.
The almond, the apricot, the walnut, the apple, the cherry, the pear, the willow, the pine and the Chinar, and shrubs and plants - common and rare - name it, and they are all here in this place, blessed by their presence.

Dr. Surendra Dhar, and Vimla, his doctor spouse, are rare specimens of human courage who preferred to stay back in Kashmir even after that 83-day ordeal when he was kidnapped by the militants and held hostage in far flung mountains along the Symthen Pass, and beyond.

His saga, chronicled in his work,
The Story of a Frozen River, is a bold attempt to unravel the contours of militancy here, and to explore the psyche of the captors and the mind of people in captivity.

The couple is holding it out and manage to live on their terms even when their kindred have fled.
They are loved and respected, not just because they dared, but because they reach out, and give their best to the patients.

Can they become the role models?
Can they, along with the residual Pandits (just a couple of thousands by the latest census), be the inspiration for the exiles to return?

To drinks, dinner and discussion on subjects serious and trivial, all touching our daily lives, all related to Kashmir – the unpleasant past, the uneasy present,
and the uncertain future.

Back to the Circuit House

Dr. Dhar drops me back and I find a good gathering here of other awardees and some visitors enjoying an after-dinner chat.

A well groomed Pandit lady, with an upright stance and a confident step, (what is she doing here, I think to myself) comes near and introduces herself as one Ms Sumbly.
She is a Central Government official, who often comes visiting here to oversee various fast-track projects about maternal health and child care.
Another is Rakesh Handoo, of the Srinagar Door Dharshan, who stuck to his post in the face of danger.
He asks if he could interview me and telecast my impressions about the award function.

One shudders to recall how Pandit Lassa Kaul, the then Director, was murdered in cold blood when militancy was at its acme in nineteen ninety.
He was killed like many others, because he was what he was, a true Indian and a Kashmir Pandit who would not be dictated by the militants to air their programs that would help boost militancy.

These are the few Pandits who, like the Dhar couple, serve Kashmiris in so many ways, and help to keep the last vestiges alive of the many-hued culture of Kashmir that is fast threatening to become insular.

They are the creaky bridges that connect the two communities; they are the last surviving links between the Muslims and Pandits; they are the last outpost of the Indian ethos in Kashmir.

Can they be the inspiration for our return?

The Mindset

I get an answer to that question, soon after, when I happen to chance upon in the gathering a top government functionary who rues that good doctors and teachers have become scarce in Kashmir after the Pandits 'fled'.

I was incensed by that word for it is a common canard, a myth perpetuated by people like him, that the Pandits 'fled' Kashmir, that they deserted their homes and hearths for the unknown terrains of exile, that they did not love their land and ditched the struggle for Azadi, that they were afflicted suddenly with a strange wander lust; because they were lured by Jagmohan.

"We need your services," he says "doctors like you are hard to find.
You could fly here on the weekends and examine any number of patients.
You can put up in a hotel or a hut; we can arrange the very best."

"What use coming here," I ask,
"if it is to stay as a guest and not in my own home, and if it is not to return for good?
And what about all other Pandits who did not flee of their own will but were forced into exodus like the rest of us?"

"Do they really want to return?" He asks.
"Do the Muslims want them back?" I ask.

He hesitates a while before he speaks,
"Yes, we want them back, but, there will have to be a consensus amongst different groups and factions, for there can be no guarantee against militants and fringe elements.
Even we don't feel safe, yet, we did not choose to run away.
We braved the bullets from both sides while you deserted mother Kashmir and made it good wherever you went.
Besides, your many leaders give the impression that you do not want to return."

I got my answer, for, like others of his ilk, he had betrayed his mindset at the very outset with his refrain that we had 'fled' and ditched the Muslims whom we left behind to face the bullet.
He did not have to make it clearer that we were really not welcome, that our return was conditional, that they needed our services and not us, that we could stay as guests but not as rightful citizens.

Was there any fun carrying on the discussion?
For, it is not the common man but the bureaucrat and the manager, the politician and the minister, who do not want the Pandits back.
It is they who debate and legislate and are in a hurry to confiscate our institutions and estates and not let us return to Kashmir.
It is they who are the worst offenders of our human rights, and not the common Kashmiri Muslims, who, like Rauf, would want us back.

Militancy is but an extension, of the no-holds-barred State terrorism that has been unleashed upon us.

Day Three
Sunday, 5 October 2008

Curfew

Another night in the guesthouse, another night of wakefulness as I collect my thoughts in the stillness and wonder more and more: Will Kashmir ever be like before?

Happily for me the muezzin from across the river jolts me out of depression with another cascade of prayer.

I await the phone call from Dr. Dhar.
He has insisted that he will drive me to Paree Mahal and Cheshma Shahi as early at dawn as can be, when fairies come dancing from the hills and angels descend from the skies, when the place is at its paradisiacal best for a quiet rendezvous.

I pick the phone on the first ring, my heart beating in anticipation.
"I am sorry,
curfew has been clamped in the valley.
The curse has fallen yet again here and we can hardly go anywhere," laments Dr. Dhar, his sonorous voice turned somber.

I am stunned for a while even as I got the answer to that recurring question I was asking myself all night - whether Kashmir could ever find peace and harmony again.

Soon, I wake up to another déjà vu of those days of endless curfews before we were forced to take flight.
It was a part of life then;
it seems a part of life now.
Curfews, hartals and shut downs, protest marches and demonstrations, violence, killings and bomb blasts - they will possibly remain for ever embedded in the Kashmiri culture.

Nothing seems to have changed here about the creed of violence and fear, and yet everything has changed for us after our unfortunate departure.
The valley has taken on a distinctly Islamic flavor, and the many-hued garden is no longer there.

It is a chronic sickness that afflicts Kashmir, a virulent virus of blind obedience to unreason that proliferates in the tissues and organs of the civil society, causing an indolence of the spirit, and a negativity that rules the mind.
I wonder if the Kashmiris know what they really want for, none has answered that question straight or to my satisfaction.

And there is another conundrum I have not been able to resolve - is it really worthwhile coming back here?

I had reserved a part of the morning to visit my friends and acquaintances, though those who really mattered are either dead or have fled, or live out of the city.

I had to offer a belated condolence on the demise, twelve years back. of our family friend, Haji Abli Bhat.
Before he died of a stroke, he had his burning wish fulfilled to visit us in Jammu, and to find out how we fared in exile.

I owed another condolence to the adopted son of Biba Masi, our worthy neighbour.
She was a barren old widow who cleaned windows and mopped floors and did odd jobs for others.
She was poor but proud, and lived a life of piety, but died cursing the militants for forcing the Pandits into exile and bringing ruin upon Kashmir.

I had also planned to visit Hafeeza, a kindly woman from Ishabar, that famous hamlet at the foot hills where people found spiritual solace, where the great Swami Lakshmanjoo found enlightenment and bliss.
She came with a gift for my wife of the first pick of cherries from her farm as a token of her affection year after year.

Since all these visits are cancelled, how do I spend the whole morning and part of the afternoon till the flight out of Srinagar, I wonder?

Why not switch back to my erstwhile routine and write a chronicle of my 48-hour sojourn since I landed here?

Writing seems the only recourse to some peace in turbulence, a catharsis for the pent up emotions, a pick-me-up for the melancholy spirit, a penance for our failings and follies, an exorcism to drive evil spirits away that have possessed the valley.

There was nothing inspirational in this hurricane trip so far, and my cherished visit to Paree Mahal, that might have lifted my spirits, was not to be.

Possibly, because it had always been my most favorite haunt, where I often hiked with my children whom I would have missed so badly.

Possibly,
because the fairies of Paree Mahal have also gone in hiding like the Hangul, or been driven far away like the Pandits.

Possibly,
because I have to pine for and wait for a propitious time to come here again.

For now, let the rabble rousers self-indulge again.
For now, let them have another field day.

Adieu

Life has come to a standstill as the van takes us along empty lanes and deserted streets, passing by shuttered shops and silent neighborhoods.

There are police pickets here and there, outside State government buildings, and on the two ends of the bridges that we cross on way to the airport.
Other than that,
and except for a stray dog scratching lazily under the shade of a tree, Srinagar has turned into a ghost city.
Even the birds on the poles and power lines, have sensed the mood and turned dumb, and there is an airlessness in the atmosphere that pervades everywhere.
If there are souls in the city they are entombed inside the houses for I do not even hear a whisper.

We stop at barricades manned by soldiers, to display our identity cards and air tickets.

I am seized with deep melancholy as I look through the windshield trying to take in the last scenes of the receding city.

I look at the helpless Vitasta tracing the tragic course of history as she seems to flow down hesitatingly.
I sweep a glance at the ring of mountains, the silent sentinels of the valley, and feel like being ferried into space to the silence of an interstellar journey, far away from fear and uncertainty and yet, feeling the pangs of separation already.

Soon we reach Srinagar International and I wonder about the billboard that welcomes you to 'Paradise' on arrival.
There is no matching signpost of farewell, but if there were one, it might rightly read,
"From Paradise turned into hell."

The Return Flight

('A man's homeland is wherever he prospers.
- Aristophanes)

Going through the formalities of the travel, I am bereft of emotion, strangely so, as on the day I started from Jammu.

As we take to wings, the valley looks graceful in her autumnal mantle - familiar little hamlets coming to view and vast stretches of fallow land, that sets me thinking again: There is no dearth of space here, and we could be settled back in these expanses without encroaching on any one, without disturbing the hamlets.
We could again be back in our homeland, and a part of the landscape, again to live in peace and harmony.

But, if there is no place for you in human hearts, what use the space on land?

I see clouds speeding past the window as we are hauled up in space, obliterating the view of the valley, breaking for a while my soliloquy as I come to grips with the reality of the utter unpredictability of the valley.

In Kashmir, even when it is bright and sunny, and the sky blue, beautiful and bold, there is always a menacing cloud lurking behind those cliffs, ready to burst and bring devastation in its wake, blow hamlets and towns away, not just the peace and harmony that I was thinking about.

Soon we cross the Pir Panjal and what a contrast - vibrant green fields of all shapes, squares, rectangles, and circles; river tributaries crisscrossing the land; and flat rooftops kissing each other, making a statement.

For once, my heart turns inside with an exceptional fondness for this land that hosted us full eighteen years and made us feel so welcome, so secure.
How come we never owned it as it owned us?

As we touch the Jammu tarmac, smiling faces greet me, familiar people who know me by name, whom I have begun to trust.
Suddenly, I get a feeling, first time in these long years, that I am returning home.

No, I am not a refugee; this place belongs to me, and I belong here.
A homeland for me is a place which gives me back my identity.

An exile from Kashmir, the author is invited to Srinagar to receive an award. He goes there after eighteen years and stays just for two days. During that time he covers lot of ground, traveling to different places, catching up with the enormous changes that have taken place in the valley.

The narrative unfolds in short episodes as the author moves from one place to another, traveling back and forth in time from the days of his childhood, comparing what was with what is, and looking into the future for how it is going to be.

The travelogue is one of the first to bring the reader to know the truth beyond the rhetoric that has masked the real tragedy of ordinary Kashmiris, and describes candidly how the guiding principles of their lives - of unity in religious diversity - got a severe mauling and changed the identity of the people.

The narrative brings out the tragedy of the Kashmiri Pandits, who were driven into exodus of unparalleled magnitude in modern times. Two decades later, their institutions, their estates and their temples lie in shambles. Their gods are abandoned and forlorn, looking for the devotees who have fled in fear.

The author poses the query: What hope for a reconciliation and reconstruction of the devastated social and cultural edifice that was the hallmark of Kashmir?

Dr. Kundan Lal Chowdhury is a medical professional, poet and writer. He has three published anthologies, and was conferred the Best Book Award for Excellence in Literature by Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy for his work, The Enchanting World Infants. Besides poetry, he writes short fiction, essays, commentaries and book reviews. He has also written a series of true medical stories under the title My Medical Diary that encompass a period of four decades of his career as a practicing doctor.
